There was once an upstanding Tech man whose father was an Oklahoma oil king. Now, papa was going to give the State University a million or so, but son, being an upstanding Tech man (or did I say that already), interrupted papa’s intentions for the good of the Institute.

"Father," says he, "have you looked into the situation at the State University?"

"No," answers papa.

"Well, I'm not the one to gossip, but it's co-educational," says son.

"Really?"

"Moreover," says son, as he leans close to papa's ear, "did you know that the boys and girls matriculate together there?"

"No!"

"What's more, they even use the same curriculum," whispers son.

"Hmmm," papa humms.

"And to cap it off," the son continues, "this is in private conference, mind you, in private conference, the co-eds have to show their theses before they can graduate."

Technology got the money.
