This conception has evolved to the belief that our government is a government not by elected experts, but by any of our people, experts or otherwise, who can convince us to get themselves a position to vote. It is this belief which has led to much of the corruption in our government.

A survey of the people was made to know well enough of each of the people we vote for to judge whether he is qualified to make important decisions. And this is a basic precaution, essential to a properly functioning representative government. A government is not a job that can be left with the rush of the campaign and the toady smile; it is a job requiring the talents of well-trained lawyers, psychologists, and politicians.

Recently a scheme was suggested by which the country would be divided into groups of perhaps a hundred men, who knew each other and all the enigmas with which we have to cope, and a solution to the fundamental problem of existence of an absolute standard of behavior. It must be an absolute code of behavior, absolutely independent of contemporary custom. The potentialities of the human mind to learn to know each other, and elect other and fewer representatives; and so on in a diminishing pyramid, until at the peak would be a small group of highly efficient men who would run the country.

This scheme is perhaps not practical, but it embodies the proper conception of representative government. We must elect men who are competent to govern, or this country will retrograde to the level of all misused organizations.

WHO PAY FOR FUNNYMAN?

Last week some one pulled a stunt which was quite amusing—for some reason, painting the Institute lights a brilliant red tickled the fancy bones of our scholars and left us with no logic or reason for the incident; it probably sprang full-armed from a slightly inebriated head.

Having been born to this particular funnyman's idea. It is unofficially reported (that is that has to pay that forty bucks in the red, rather than the Institute. It is that has to pay that forty bucks in the red, rather than the Institute.

Drawing on the populace in the contemporary world. And other well. These hundred men would elect one of them, whom they considered best qualified, to represent the group. The representatives of these groups would meet, learn to know each other, and elect other and fewer representatives; and so on in a diminishing pyramid, until at the peak would be a small group of highly efficient men who would run the country.

The scheme is perhaps not practical, but it embodies the proper conception of representative government. We must elect men who are competent to govern, or this country will retrograde to the level of all misused organizations.

THE READER SPEAKS

Editor, The Tech:

Your plan for reform in placing the dictator's tunic is quite laudable, but let us not allow internal politics to cloud this act. It is perfectly true that Germany has contributed greatly to the world's cultural and scientific wealth in the past. Today Germany is leading in such fields as physics, chemistry, and the other technical sciences. And it is not only the government that Germany is currently not a contributor of useful knowledge, which is a threat to the world in general.

The student who above all else is interested in Germany to be an active contributor of culture, it is hoped to believe that such contributions come to the attention of the people only after the passage of many years. In most institutions, change is gradual, and the absence of a philosophy has been an obstacle on the path to the contemporary world. And these immediate effects may be so violent that the students are unable to see the good.

Hence in jailing the actions of any authority today we must focus our attention on the more subtle influences on the present scene and get their control if we ever expect to reap the benefits of those infinitely more precious, but slow, elements, forming the arts and sciences.
