William A. Pearson Saves Man From Drowning In Charles

This bit of drama took place last week in the Charles River at 6:30 P.M. last night. William A. Pearson, Jr., who was out for a swim with an unidentified friend, had his life saved by the quick action of a pedestrian.

While crossing Harvard Bridge on his way home from classes, Pearson, a member of the Freshman class, was carried away by the force of the waves, and immediately his attention was called to the fact that a man was in distress. Pearson, who is a member of the Harvard Rowing Club, immediately jumped into the water and swam to the assistance of his friend, who was struggling to reach the shore.

The two men were able to reach the shore safely, and Pearson was hailed as a hero for his quick action and courage.
