President Roosevelt Warns U.S. Against Stops In Production

In a fighting speech full of common-sense for victory, for the United States, President Roosevelt last night urged his American audience against imposed isolationism, against fatalistic views aiding the propagation, and finally against any stoppages to our day and night stream of production.

Reminder of his world-wide audience of Washington's eighth long struggle against overwhelming odds, the President that "Washington's conduct in those times provided a model of courage.

In a war coming every once in a while, love, fought at vast distances, Mr. Roosevelt emphasized that we must strike our enemies "wherever and whenever we can meet them," and that we must counter their offensive by creating democracy and their "stone and conquer policy."

The President stressed the necessity of keeping open our lines of communication to the Orient, the South Atlantic, the Indian Ocean, and the Pacific, so that the flow of armaments to distant battle fields might continue as long as the United States has anything to contribute. President Roosevelt condemned the idea that the American eagle could live in isolation, without conflict. He went on: "We prefer," he said, "to be a peacemaker with a rifle, than a peacemaker by a veto.
