Tuesday, March 24, 1942

THE TECH

Industrialization Of South America Alters Our View

Political Problems — II

The motivating power in the attitude of the United States toward Latin America during the past century has been the desire to maintain the status of self-protection. Our so-called "Monroe Doctrine," which was established so that any foreign policy could no longer be consistently pursued, was seriously threatened when we entered the war. This threat was realized when we entered the war.

The United States has been the predominant state during the past century, partly because of the desire to maintain the status of self-protection. Our so-called "Monroe Doctrine," which was established to prevent any other country from becoming a threat to the United States, has been seriously threatened when we entered the war.

The United States has been the predominant state during the past century, partly because of the desire to maintain the status of self-protection. Our so-called "Monroe Doctrine," which was established to prevent any other country from becoming a threat to the United States, has been seriously threatened when we entered the war.

The United States has been the predominant state during the past century, partly because of the desire to maintain the status of self-protection. Our so-called "Monroe Doctrine," which was established to prevent any other country from becoming a threat to the United States, has been seriously threatened when we entered the war.

The United States has been the predominant state during the past century, partly because of the desire to maintain the status of self-protection. Our so-called "Monroe Doctrine," which was established to prevent any other country from becoming a threat to the United States, has been seriously threatened when we entered the war.

The United States has been the predominant state during the past century, partly because of the desire to maintain the status of self-protection. Our so-called "Monroe Doctrine," which was established to prevent any other country from becoming a threat to the United States, has been seriously threatened when we entered the war.

The United States has been the predominant state during the past century, partly because of the desire to maintain the status of self-protection. Our so-called "Monroe Doctrine," which was established to prevent any other country from becoming a threat to the United States, has been seriously threatened when we entered the war.

The United States has been the predominant state during the past century, partly because of the desire to maintain the status of self-protection. Our so-called "Monroe Doctrine," which was established to prevent any other country from becoming a threat to the United States, has been seriously threatened when we entered the war.

The United States has been the predominant state during the past century, partly because of the desire to maintain the status of self-protection. Our so-called "Monroe Doctrine," which was established to prevent any other country from becoming a threat to the United States, has been seriously threatened when we entered the war.

The United States has been the predominant state during the past century, partly because of the desire to maintain the status of self-protection. Our so-called "Monroe Doctrine," which was established to prevent any other country from becoming a threat to the United States, has been seriously threatened when we entered the war.

The United States has been the predominant state during the past century, partly because of the desire to maintain the status of self-protection. Our so-called "Monroe Doctrine," which was established to prevent any other country from becoming a threat to the United States, has been seriously threatened when we entered the war.

The United States has been the predominant state during the past century, partly because of the desire to maintain the status of self-protection. Our so-called "Monroe Doctrine," which was established to prevent any other country from becoming a threat to the United States, has been seriously threatened when we entered the war.

The United States has been the predominant state during the past century, partly because of the desire to maintain the status of self-protection. Our so-called "Monroe Doctrine," which was established to prevent any other country from becoming a threat to the United States, has been seriously threatened when we entered the war.

The United States has been the predominant state during the past century, partly because of the desire to maintain the status of self-protection. Our so-called "Monroe Doctrine," which was established to prevent any other country from becoming a threat to the United States, has been seriously threatened when we entered the war.

The United States has been the predominant state during the past century, partly because of the desire to maintain the status of self-protection. Our so-called "Monroe Doctrine," which was established to prevent any other country from becoming a threat to the United States, has been seriously threatened when we entered the war.