The record of the work and contributions of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology during the war was one of triumphs--triumphs, for any Tech man may well feel proud. In those years of national emergency, the Institute proved its ability to train men for service in the military and naval forces as well as it had trained men in the past for service in industry. In connection with the 1941-42 enlistment, 18,000 Tech men were trained as officer material for the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps. During the war, practical flight training was given to a large number of Tech men, and many scored heavily in the eyes of the Army and Navy. Many of the Tech men who had never dreamed of going into the service were flying planes or navigating them. The work was done so well that the:much vaunted "fly-by-wire" of the future was put into practical use.
