Army Specialist Training Begins; Here At Institute

The Army Specialist Training Program has been established at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology with 82 trainees detailed from the United States Service Commanding throughout the world. The program is designed to train specialists in mechanical, electrical, and chemical engineering, it was announced today. Part of this group will take special refresher courses in mathematics, physics, or chemistry before beginning the engineering phase of their training.

The new training unit has been organized as a regiment. This group, as well as approximately 600 trainees from Fort Benning, Georgia, the Air Corps, is under command of Maj. H. W. Dorsey and Lieut. W. H. Potulski of the Department of Military Science and Tactics at the Institute.

The new training unit is organized and equipped in such a way that a trainee will be appointed acting officers and non-commissioned officers who are to serve in this training Program and will be required to act as the trainees when the first. Under the supervision of the acting officers and non-commissioned officers, they will be used as assistant instructors within the Barracks, with the latter being required to assume responsibility for drill, fire, and army military courtesy, and similar matters.

Suggestions Made to the Institute's Dormitories, which were recently vacated by civilian student, were the basis for their training. To allow 16 hours of work a week, the trainees are to be given five days training, five hours of drill, and three hours of literature, divided into drill, classes or lectures, and two hours of preparation for the next. The training Program at the Institute consists of the above forms of training, and each. At the end of each term, the trainees will be required to receive a special report.
