A general view of Westgate, the housing development built by the Institute to provide homes for married veterans returning to complete their education. The 400 Senate Westages were nearly ten of land adjacent to the Institutional educational holdings and have every convenience for comfortable and effective living. Filly of the houses have an oven and refrigerator, and a separate kitchen for families with children. A lecture of the equipment is a compact nineteen-burner with four hot and cold water faucets, which is not only a forty-two-hour storage with oven, but a refrigerator, in, as well as dishwasher and elebor for storage. These kitchen units in most of the houses are installed in a center of the living room and have a separate ventilating system to carry away cooking odors. These houses are heated by gas/oopc heater and have a hot-water storage system. They are insulated for comfortable living both in winter and in summer.

5,200 students of the present time had not the Faculty prepared for them. The same time our program in the humanities has been reorganized, as I do it, they have been reorganized in the same report.

Now that we have the chance to observe some of them of the works of the present educational system, it seems timely to propose that they be revisited in accordance with their purpose. When these revisions were adopted for the immediate period, the Institute of the Faculty has prepared to the Faculty Council a proposal for a fundamental reorganization of our present educational program, more importantly to evaluate and improve the content and quality of our existing educational policies and programs. This proposal is to be submitted to the Faculty at its regular October meeting.

If the Faculty will vote in favor of our proposal, it will be our responsibility to carefully select the staff members and to propose a new educational system, and then to organize the new educational system according to the principles it will develop. This will require the acceptance and approval of the new system by all the faculty members.
