Tech Co-eds Named Nation's Beautie

Battered Contest
Judge Found In Wellesley Ash Can

The American collegiate world was shocked today to hear that the nation-wide collegiate magazine, Durty News, had selected Technology Co-eds as the most beautiful and talented group of women students in the country. An immediate cry was raised at Harvard, which had expected to win the coveted award. All co-eds at the Institute will be entitled to wear a garland of raspberries, to signify the glory involved. In addition, the group will be presented with a prize; rumours have it that they are asking for a ten-foot slide rule with accuracy to the sixth place.

There has been an extreme amount of difficulty in finding any of the contest judges, but using our slide rule as a probe, we located one of these bedraggled individuals lying in what appeared to be a pool of gin, but what on closer inspection turned out to be the result of an evening of drooling.

Upon seeing the approach of another male, this character was only able to utter, "as . . . s . . . h."

"Tech girls have two fine points that girls in other schools do not have," he commenced in an unsteady voice. However, after seeing the look on our faces, he modified his statement. He admitted that most girls did have these two points, but Tech girls had them in greater degree. Our curiosity as well as our temperature rose, someone ran to get an attorney. Was this legal? Should Voo Doo be called? We attempted to question further, but all that he could moan was "Murg-a-Troid, Murg-a-Troid what makes your big tail so soft." We concluded that he was speaking of that pre-historic animal, the Murg-a-Troid which plagued early mankind.

At this instant, a reporter from the Harvard Lampie arrived on the scene. We were slightly shocked to be caught alone with a Harvard man. He shrieked, "do you, I do." I answered that I did. He went away happy, content in the thought that two out of two college newspaper reporters do.
