As a result of the Nineteenth Century, India's Moslem minority was being harried by the Hindu population. This problem was exacerbated by the fact that India's Moslem minority had not been able to form a united front during the partition of the country. During six of the last seven years, during six of which he was the deputy president. During this period he was closely identified with the Indian National Congress, which was to take the lead in drafting the constitution of Pakistan. In the interim government, which was to be formed after the partition, he was appointed as its deputy president.

The Partition Act, passed by the British Parliament on August 17, 1947, had decided that a partition into two separate states be made, one Hindu and the other Moslem. This decision was taken in consultation with the leaders of the two communities. The partition was to be effective from August 15, 1947.

The partition led to a large-scale exodus of people from one state to the other. An estimated 14 million people were displaced as a result of the partition. The exodus was marked by violence and destruction, with raids and looting on both sides of the border. The situation was further exacerbated by the fact that the two states were not able to agree on the status of the state of Jammu and Kashmir, which was not included in the partition agreement.

The partition of India and Pakistan led to the creation of two separate states, one majority Hindu and the other majority Moslem. The partition was a major event in the history of India and Pakistan, and it had a profound impact on the lives of millions of people. The partition led to the creation of Bangladesh, which was recognized as an independent state in December 1971.
