been told time and time again. Just what constitutes “early aid” in terms of such a long-range defense program? One need only examine the World War II record of the Institute to find important examples of weapons and techniques which had their roots in basic research, or to note in some cases the rapidity with which technical outgrowths follow fundamental discoveries.

Yet, war should not be the prime motivation behind the establishment of a science foundation. The nation is supposedly dedicated to the truth; and nowhere is the truth sought more assiduously than in the laboratories of basic science.
