the scene master was young and dashing; he seems to be cut out for straight, forward parts of this type. Taplow, one of the fifteen-year-olds, did well in the role of a pompous and involved type. He made a brilliant task of mimicking the pompous and involved style of speech of his master.

The camera moves from class-room to master's house to chapel to cricket field to assembly hall, with-out staying too long anywhere, and thus avoids the static situations inherent in a stage production. The incidental music is unobtrusive except for a loud burst of Beethoven at the end. The screen-play was changed very little from the original, with the result that most of the characters spoke at greater length than was warranted in a given situation.

But all in all "The Browning Version" is one of the best movies being shown at the moment in Boston.
