Continental Defense Topic Of Atlantic Monthly Story

President James R. Killian, Jr. and Professor Albert G. Hill, Director of Lincoln Laboratory, have pointed out in the public an article entitled "Continental Defense" appearing in the November Atlantic Monthly, some important points concerning possible enemy attack this summer. We hold that our present defenses against atomic attack are inadequate to prevent a crippling blow if an attack should be launched in the near future. The article outlines the requirements of the defense system which must be developed to oppose any security against sudden atomic destruction. It is also stated that the administration has selected targets in this country which could kill or injure millions of people. America might not survive an attack, and even though we were able to detect our enemy in a surprise attack, we could not defend our country, even though we were able to detect our enemy in a surprise attack. The facts stated are not definite or irrefutable, but they are strongly implied that the United States is not secure against a sudden attack. The article also states that the United States is not secure against a sudden attack. The article also states that the United States is not secure against a sudden attack.
