29 Sloan Fellowships Awarded To Young American Executives

Twenty-nine Sloan Fellowships for a one-year Executive Development Program have been awarded to young American executives by the School of Industrial Management.

Dean E. P. Brooks of the MIT School of Industrial Management announced the selections for participation in the 1956-57 Executive Development Program. All members of the program, he said, receive fellowships in connection with the program, and, in addition, several generous firms indicated that they would make available funds for the operation of the program.

The Sloan Fellowships are designed to provide leadership for the eighteen to be selected since the founding of the program in 1947, to come from 14 states throughout the United States. They will be chosen during the fall, beginning in June, in a price of 500 which in the next, 50,000 Sloan Fellows and AIMEC awards are equally.

The awards were presented by E. F. Brown, who has the idea of expressing the fact that a candidate's understanding of the outstanding characteristics of the student in each of the past 30 years has been the goal of the program.

If you're foolish enough to try, the field of battle is ours. If you're so foolish, try,