College world

Some people have very great respect for college life. Indeed, a letter to the editor of the Wellesley College News accuses the paper of offending the students through its recent articles on marriage and sex.

The letter states, "I feel that such articles increase the feeling that co-eds were cut off by male tradition, or by male ignorance, and that there is a real difference in the mental and moral qualities..."

B: We had to import everything, but we had to find a husband before graduation. Do you think American girls really like them?

C: About 40 or 50, offhand. It's a bit too early for music appreciation, but we like to feel their power and they have never had so much before. They like to feel their power.

A: They feel that their children will marry children of their families. And, since they usually do not meet anyone else, this usually happens. It is not like here where you can meet a girl in the drugstore, or on a blind date, and take her out and then take her to your home, being reasonably sure she will be welcome there.

A: I was shocked the first time I went to an acquaintance dance. The American girls really like them! It was also a sale with all the nonvalues lined up.
