Formation Of MIT School For Advanced Study Announced; Institute Professor Martin Buerger Named First Director

Dr. Killian Announces New School At Corporation New York Banquet

Establishment of a School for Advanced Study at the Institute was announced last Wednesday by President Killian.

The new school will provide means by which post-doctoral scholars from all over the world can join the graduate faculty in high-level theoretical studies and research. Dr. Martin J. Buerger, professor of mathematics and crystallography, has been appointed director.

A dinner was made at a dinner at The Waldorf-Astoria given by the new School to guests, including many alumni. Typhus was paid a visit in the late Karl Killian, chairman of the Board of the Institute, by Dr. Killian and the other speakers. The dinner is in full view of the School's most recent achievement.

Dr. Buerger, who is an expert in the School's programs, was introduced by Professor Killian.

"Much can be done to help the advancement of American education by the Institute," said Dr. Killian pointed out. "We want to help the advancement of American education by the Institute and we are glad to be of any help to you in your work."
