political scene --- the issues

Assuming that each side is willing to back down some, that is its announced position, there are several forms that a compromise might take. For example, it might be agreed to avoid the civil rights issue entirely in the party conventions and the primaries. But even then, it is possible that support might well cut off patronage to that area. Of course no matter what the outcome of the presidential race, the South needs to feel that a Democratic candidate will still have a strong bloc of votes in the Senate. This is a mighty lever which could be used on any President, no matter how personally popular. The South accepted the risk of splitting in 1948 and then had the bitterest. This is the highest compliment that we can pay our system of government.

That splinter movement would involve risk is apparent. A Democratic president elected without Southern support might well cut off patronage to that area. EDITORIAL

Night Friday, the beginning of another college week- end. A break from studying, a dance, a movie, the possible occasion for a dinner dance, a junior dance, or a movie. Two Boston College freshmen and their dates were driving home at three o'clock on the morning of May 7. It had been a big day for them: a dance; after attending the affair at the Hotel Bradford, they had driven twenty-five miles to a Lowell restaurant for a late meal. But as the tiny town of Northbridge, a large tractor-trailer, coming off the bridge, plowed into the side of their car and sent it spinning into a concrete pole. The driver and his date escaped with minor injuries; the couple in the back seat were killed.

The accident took place on the corner of Massachusetts Avenue and Memorial Drive, on the doorstep of M.I.T.
