The President Foresees . . .

It is too late now to tell the student body that MIT's president, Dr. Julius Stratton, spoke for over an hour in Kresge Auditorium last Thursday on 'The Future of MIT.' The audience was large, and everyone at MIT, which is over 1000 students, felt the occasion was important. MIT is a very large institution, and even the president's most optimistic forecasts may be more than fulfilled.

Dr. Stratton said that MIT is a community of people, not just a large, impersonal institution. He emphasized the importance of individuality and creativity in the educational process. He also spoke about the need for MIT to continue its work in research and development, and the importance of interdisciplinary cooperation.

The President also discussed the role of MIT in society and the world, and the need for the institution to be a leader in addressing global challenges. He cited the example of MIT's work in renewable energy and climate change.

Dr. Stratton concluded his speech by thanking the audience for their support and expressing his confidence in the future of MIT.
