There was considerable com- motion during the Centennial week over a controversy concerning the visas issued to the guests expected from the Soviet Union. It was indicated that a typing error in the State Department had reduced the validity of the visas to such a short period as to preclude an appearance at MIT. A substitute group of Russians was sent up from a conference in New Jersey to replace the missing scientists.

Much disappointment was ex- pressed that the Soviets had not been able to attend the panels discussing science and international relations.

Sideling to the Centennial were an art exhibit in the Hay- den Gallery featuring works from the collections of alumni, including Dr. Stratton and Dr. Kilman. The public proceedings were closed out Sunday night with the singing of Haydn's Creation Oratorio by the MIT Choral Society.

The actual day of founding, April 10, 1861, was observed at a student convocation on Mon- day, hearing Dr. Stratton, and the reporters from the closed panel discussions.

Sir John Cockcroft, Master of Churchill College, in Cambridge University, was awarded the Atoms for Peace Award for his work in atomic nuclear and his leadership in the establish- ment of the British Atomic En- ergy Research Establishment for the study of peaceful uses for nuclear energy.

Sir John received a gold medallion symbolizing the award and an honorarium of $750.

The award was established in 1965 by the Ford Motor Company Fund in response to President Eisenhower's plea for industry's support of research in peaceful uses for atomic power. The awards are handled by an independent, non-profit organization which has MIT as its headquarters and is headed by James R. Kilman Jr.
