One of the most colorful spectacles of the school year took place last Saturday evening as the MIT swimmers and diving teams competed against Harvard. The meet was held in the MIT pool at 6:30 p.m., while the diving team exhibition followed. The meet was a part of the series of events scheduled for the weekend, and was highlighted by the meet's record-breaking performances.

The MIT swimmers and diving team were led by coach Charlie Engleger, who has been instrumental in bringing the team to national prominence. Under his guidance, the team has achieved several notable victories, including a recent meet against Harvard, where they won 114-54. Engleger is known for his strategic planning and his ability to motivate his swimmers to reach their full potential.

The diving team exhibition was a highlight of the weekend, featuring several of the team's top performers, including Dave Cahlander and Jon Wender. Cahlander, a senior, is a three-time All-American diver, and has won several national championships. Wender, a junior, is another of the team's top performers, and has been consistently impressive in both diving and swimming events.

The meet was attended by a large crowd of spectators, who were treated to a spectacular display of athletic prowess. The swimmers and divers performed a variety of routines, showcasing their skills and technique. The diving exhibition was particularly impressive, with several of the team's top performers demonstrating their ability to execute precise and difficult dives.

In summary, the MIT swimmers and diving team's victory over Harvard was a resounding success, and a fitting end to a successful season. The team's dedication and hard work have paid off, and their achievements are a source of pride for the entire MIT community. The diving exhibition was a fitting conclusion to the weekend, and a testament to the talent and skill of MIT's athletes. With the conclusion of the season, the team can look back on a year of success and anticipation for the future.