Once you abandon the finals that in the last few years have been even more important than the examinations themselves, the main problem that faces the university is to find an alternative to the final examinations. It is not enough to replace the final examinations by a quiz and to which I'm sure few students would object. Courses which are geared toward the one purpose of securing an easy pass, or which do not require any real effort on the part of the student, should be abolished. The only way to cure this evil is to have no examinations at all. A student should be able to pass an examination only if he has mastered the subject matter. An examination should be a test of what a student has learned, not an evaluation of his ability to learn. A student should not be allowed to fail an examination if he has not studied the subject matter. A student should not be allowed to pass an examination if he has not studied the subject matter. A student should not be allowed to pass an examination if he has not studied the subject matter. A student should not be allowed to pass an examination if he has not studied the subject matter. A student should not be allowed to pass an examination if he has not studied the subject matter. A student should not be allowed to pass an examination if he has not studied the subject matter.

Once you abandon the finals that in the last few years have been even more important than the examinations themselves, the main problem that faces the university is to find an alternative to the final examinations. It is not enough to replace the final examinations by a quiz and to which I'm sure few students would object. Courses which are geared toward the one purpose of securing an easy pass, or which do not require any real effort on the part of the student, should be abolished. The only way to cure this evil is to have no examinations at all. A student should be able to pass an examination only if he has mastered the subject matter. An examination should be a test of what a student has learned, not an evaluation of his ability to learn. A student should not be allowed to fail an examination if he has not studied the subject matter. A student should not be allowed to pass an examination if he has not studied the subject matter. A student should not be allowed to pass an examination if he has not studied the subject matter. A student should not be allowed to pass an examination if he has not studied the subject matter. A student should not be allowed to pass an examination if he has not studied the subject matter. A student should not be allowed to pass an examination if he has not studied the subject matter.

Once you abandon the finals that in the last few years have been even more important than the examinations themselves, the main problem that faces the university is to find an alternative to the final examinations. It is not enough to replace the final examinations by a quiz and to which I'm sure few students would object. Courses which are geared toward the one purpose of securing an easy pass, or which do not require any real effort on the part of the student, should be abolished. The only way to cure this evil is to have no examinations at all. A student should be able to pass an examination only if he has mastered the subject matter. An examination should be a test of what a student has learned, not an evaluation of his ability to learn. A student should not be allowed to fail an examination if he has not studied the subject matter. A student should not be allowed to pass an examination if he has not studied the subject matter. A student should not be allowed to pass an examination if he has not studied the subject matter. A student should not be allowed to pass an examination if he has not studied the subject matter. A student should not be allowed to pass an examination if he has not studied the subject matter. A student should not be allowed to pass an examination if he has not studied the subject matter.