The Civil Engineering Department has announced preliminary plans for a new Inter-American Cooperative Program.

Petroleum Professor C. F. McCarty, Assistant Director of the project, told the Tech of plans to bring students from Latin American universities with groups of specially selected MIT faculty and students, in a two year effort directed at finding new and acute problems to be studied by the Americans.

The program has been accepted for this program because of the many problems common to the Latin American countries. Indeed, it represents a community of vital interest to the United States, comprising some 210 million people. It is the hope of the university and exports and imports. Its proximity and long tradition of University of Unaffiliated Association has been well noted for the give and take nature of this program.

Some of the problems which have been proposed for this program include the application of stereo photography and photogrammetry surveying and mapping of inaccessible areas, the application of operations research techniques to the design of communications systems, one of America's major problems, and the application of new design material and technology of water control, which is still a major problem.

He also said, "It was unfortunate that we caused so much hard feeling and we regret that this matter grew so far out of hand. We do not feel that the police are correct in this, but we do feel that the staff should have intervened sooner."

"We are going to do our best to make sure that this never happens again," he added. "We want to assure the public that we are working on a solution to this problem."
