Faculty Group Presses Shelter Protest, Arms Issue

By Don Goldstein

An unexpectedly large and favorable reception to the "Open Letter to President Kennedy" was announced in the New York Times on March 14, 1963. The letter, which was distributed to some 200 American universities, prompted a group of Boston professors to form a permanent organization of academics on the campus. A meeting of representatives of the group was held on March 15, 1963, at the Boston-Area Faculty Press Club to discuss the development of an additional $400,000 for inadequate public protection of new communities, and inadequate expenditures for inadequate private protection.

A meeting of representatives of the group was held on March 15, 1963, at the Boston-Area Faculty Press Club to discuss the development of an additional $400,000 for inadequate public protection and an improvement in individual expenditures for inadequately protected areas.

The letter was written by a group of professors who have been working on the problem of public safety for some time. The letter calls for a national clearing house to be established to coordinate the efforts of the many groups working on the problem. The clearing house would be established by the Boston-Area Faculty Press Club and would be composed of representatives from the local groups, their supporters, and those who have been working on the problem.
