Introduction To Sports
Managing

One of the largest and most rewarding of all MIT activities is the MIT Athletic Association. The MIT offers a great opportunity to those who desire executive experience and responsibility and a chance to perform a vital service to MIT athletics, especially in the field of Intercollegiate Freshman and Varsity Managing. Managing of Intercollegiate sports forms one of the largest divisions of the Athletic Association, and in this field there are many openings, especially for freshmen and sophomores.

Managerial Work Demanding
The duties and responsibilities of the manager are many. To the team, he must be the jack-of-all-trades. At practices and at games he works hard and long hours, often arriving before and leaving long after the regular participants. On away trips, he is trusted as the man who will take care of the team. He must be the man of whom head and assistant-managers and managers have few worries about the administration of the trip. Each sport has different requirements and problems, and each varies its managerial importance differently, but they all have two things in common: a lot of hard and demanding work, and the satisfaction of a job well done and of helping an MIT athletic team to achieve its peak performance.

Prepares Budget
But there is another side of the coin as well. The money for the trips and such must be budgeted and appropriated by the Athletic Council. Every manager is responsible for the drawing up of the team's budget, in February, for the following year, from which the total Intercollegiate budget for that year is determined. This year the budget for the total Intercollegiate budget was $30,000, spread over eighteen sports.

This places quite a responsibility on each of the eighteen head managers for drawing up and administering these budgets, and the satisfaction of a job well done and of helping an MIT athletic team to achieve its peak performance.
