THE FOUR DAYS OF NAPLES is an Oscar-winning film by Robert Wise, musical by Van Heusen, lyrics by Klein. From the Tobacco Road of Naples, to the regal beauty of the center of the city, comes a film which will give you a new war film sentiment: a woman by her war's dead body, a boy and his mother eating a potato. When the emotions get out of control, however, the result is a dismally overdone scene like the death of the Reform-School director. Also, one feels an excess of strongly emotional sequences, which tend to be a trifle tiring. Surely the death of Anna Magnani in Rossellini's "Open City," one of the most impressive scenes ever filmed, would have been far less effective if surrounded by twenty similar scenes.

Even if 'The Four Days of Naples' is far from being a complete success, it remains a good film, often unusually powerful. The war scenes were very good, among the best in years. The script, if over-sentimental sometimes, is frequently successful in its alternation of emotion and daily life detail. 'The Four Days of Naples' is certainly a film to see.
