Health Department renews war on Back Bay rodents

The Boston Public Health Department has announced its new campaign to exterminate a large scale rodent control project in the Back Bay. The project will involve exterminating the existing rodent population and stricter enforcement of health regulations pertaining to garbage and trash disposal.

Francis Gage, Director of Environmental Sanitation for Boston, announced that a pest control program will be undertaken in Back Bay, Back Street, Boylston Street, and Kenmore Square, including approximately 1,500 dwellings. It is particularly attractive to rats, it was pointed out, because of its proximity to the Charles River, thus many narrow alleyways, and its concentration of commercial and food establishments, rooming houses, and possible drainages.

Exactly half of MIT's roofed eight fraternities are in this district and will be directly affected by this first phase of the extermination project. Further efforts by the Health Department to begin may well involve the Bay State Boulevard area where six additional fraternities and the MIT Student House are located.
