MIT studies loan policy
“We are still after money for a chemistry building.”
Neither of the officials thought any controversy would arise from the increased government aid to education. Snyder saw “no implication of government interest” possible in the event of an outright grant.

NDEA loans increased
On the same day that the $1 billion aid to education bill was passed, the Senate reached final agreement on a $1.5 billion measure providing grants to the states for vocational education and a large increase in National Defense Education Act loans.

The provision ceiling of $250 thousand per institution was raised to $275 thousand.
