"27 Wagons Full of Cotton" and "Excursion" were presented as Dramashop's third evening of one-act plays this year. These productions are almost completely student run with only the necessary minimum of professional supervision and guidance to allow student directors, actors, and technicians to experiment with ideas and to learn in realistic, professional, and at the same time informal, exciting, the extent of their effectiveness. Strict time and budget limitations encourage enthu- siastic students to work within the limits of their abilities. The talent and dedication of these students are quite evident in the two productions presented.

The first offering on the double bill was "27 Wagons Full of Cotton," set in the Mississippi Delta during the 1930s. It concerns the doings of Jake Og action, an outlandish cotton gin owner who turns to action to meet the economic crisis generated when a large farming syndicate erects its own gin, thus driving the more sympathetic Gin, who seduces Florea in revenge.

This simple plot, with minor variations, has been around for a long time. Chao never uses a greedy miller, his wife and daughter, and a couple of enterprising college students. We witness fully the opportunities for broad humor inherent in the plot, but, as a serious dramatic of our time did not let it go at this. His honesty inspired him to do a better picture -- Jake and Florea who, after all, have never been further from home than Moon Lake, somehow more sympathetic than Venus, for whom the whole episode with the mysterious Mrs. Ogden is merely a cynical, dirty joke.

Jake Morland, as Jake, was not wholly believable in the first scene, but warmed up to a suitable pitch of somber vulgarity for the remainder of the show. Johanna Maddison's portrayal of Florea was basically intelligently and sound, and most of the small lapses in her work would doubtless have been smoothed out with more rehearsal time. As Silva Viscara, Gary Feldman did not always manage to establish a persistent Mrs. Ogden is merely a cynical, dirty joke.

Here's a fair summary of his work, our culture is not seriously impoverished.

There are striking, effective moments in the play, but on the whole, it is contrived and strained. Its symbolism is complex and artificial, but boils down almost
