Kilian speaks out:

New England must increase graduate work in science

Dr. James R. Killian, Jr., Chairman of the MIT Corporation, last Wednesday challenged New England to produce more centers for graduate education in the sciences. In a speech at Boston before the Fourth National Conference on the Peaceful Uses of Space, Dr. Kilian focused his attention directly on the problem: "Of the 40 institutions in the US giving the most doctorates, there are presently only four located in New England."

Dr. Killian went on to state that the total number of doctorates in science, engineering and mathematics granted in this area must be increased. More important, it must be done "by expanded graduate study in institutions other than those which have already expanded their output."
