Straton honored
New Academy created

Three noted engineers now at MIT were named as founding members of the new National Academy of Engineering.

Named were Julius A. Straton, President, and Professors Antoine M. Gaudin and Thomas K. Sheard.

Dr. Gaudin is now the Course XVII Emeritus of the School of Science, while Dr. Sheard, a director of the Metallurgy section, is also a founder of the Academy.

The announcement was made recently by the President of the Academy.

The Academy was founded by Sir Edward Burne-Jones, and posters by Roy Lichtenstein will all be offered. The sale will be held Friday, November 20, at the TCA.
