Indian Institute management school described

According to John M. Wynn, associate dean of the Alfred P. Sloan School of Management at MIT, the Indian Institute of Management at Calcutta, which has a new graduate school of management, was established in 1960, is the direct result of the expansion of Indian industry that has taken place. "The independence has occasioned lively interest in the techniques of management," Mr. Wynn, who recently returned from a recent trip to India since its establishment, said.

The Indian faculty and research staff have been steadily growing, with new types of educational programs being started. Some of these are geared to the needs of the Indian industry. MIT's activity in management education in India began in 1959 in response to an invitation from the All India Management Association of MIT to conduct seminars in advanced management techniques for senior executives. The seminars, which have been held each summer since 1959, are designed to enroll the participants in a new graduate course to be conducted at MIT. The Indian Institute of Management at Calcutta, which has a new graduate school of management, was established in 1960, is the direct result of the expansion of Indian industry that has taken place. "The independence has occasioned lively interest in the techniques of management," Mr. Wynn, who recently returned from a recent trip to India since its establishment, said.

The Indian faculty and research staff have been steadily growing, with new types of educational programs being started. Some of these are geared to the needs of the Indian industry. MIT's activity in management education in India began in 1959 in response to an invitation from the All India Management Association of MIT to conduct seminars in advanced management techniques for senior executives. The seminars, which have been held each summer since 1959, are designed to enroll the participants in a new graduate course to be conducted at MIT. The Indian Institute of Management at Calcutta, which has a new graduate school of management, was established in 1960, is the direct result of the expansion of Indian industry that has taken place. "The independence has occasioned lively interest in the techniques of management," Mr. Wynn, who recently returned from a recent trip to India since its establishment, said.

The Indian faculty and research staff have been steadily growing, with new types of educational programs being started. Some of these are geared to the needs of the Indian industry. MIT's activity in management education in India began in 1959 in response to an invitation from the All India Management Association of MIT to conduct seminars in advanced management techniques for senior executives. The seminars, which have been held each summer since 1959, are designed to enroll the participants in a new graduate course to be conducted at MIT. The Indian Institute of Management at Calcutta, which has a new graduate school of management, was established in 1960, is the direct result of the expansion of Indian industry that has taken place. "The independence has occasioned lively interest in the techniques of management," Mr. Wynn, who recently returned from a recent trip to India since its establishment, said.

The Indian faculty and research staff have been steadily growing, with new types of educational programs being started. Some of these are geared to the needs of the Indian industry. MIT's activity in management education in India began in 1959 in response to an invitation from the All India Management Association of MIT to conduct seminars in advanced management techniques for senior executives. The seminars, which have been held each summer since 1959, are designed to enroll the participants in a new graduate course to be conducted at MIT. The Indian Institute of Management at Calcutta, which has a new graduate school of management, was established in 1960, is the direct result of the expansion of Indian industry that has taken place. "The independence has occasioned lively interest in the techniques of management," Mr. Wynn, who recently returned from a recent trip to India since its establishment, said.

The Indian faculty and research staff have been steadily growing, with new types of educational programs being started. Some of these are geared to the needs of the Indian industry. MIT's activity in management education in India began in 1959 in response to an invitation from the All India Management Association of MIT to conduct seminars in advanced management techniques for senior executives. The seminars, which have been held each summer since 1959, are designed to enroll the participants in a new graduate course to be conducted at MIT. The Indian Institute of Management at Calcutta, which has a new graduate school of management, was established in 1960, is the direct result of the expansion of Indian industry that has taken place. "The independence has occasioned lively interest in the techniques of management," Mr. Wynn, who recently returned from a recent trip to India since its establishment, said.

The Indian faculty and research staff have been steadily growing, with new types of educational programs being started. Some of these are geared to the needs of the Indian industry. MIT's activity in management education in India began in 1959 in response to an invitation from the All India Management Association of MIT to conduct seminars in advanced management techniques for senior executives. The seminars, which have been held each summer since 1959, are designed to enroll the participants in a new graduate course to be conducted at MIT. The Indian Institute of Management at Calcutta, which has a new graduate school of management, was established in 1960, is the direct result of the expansion of Indian industry that has taken place. "The independence has occasioned lively interest in the techniques of management," Mr. Wynn, who recently returned from a recent trip to India since its establishment, said.

The Indian faculty and research staff have been steadily growing, with new types of educational programs being started. Some of these are geared to the needs of the Indian industry. MIT's activity in management education in India began in 1959 in response to an invitation from the All India Management Association of MIT to conduct seminars in advanced management techniques for senior executives. The seminars, which have been held each summer since 1959, are designed to enroll the participants in a new graduate course to be conducted at MIT. The Indian Institute of Management at Calcutta, which has a new graduate school of management, was established in 1960, is the direct result of the expansion of Indian industry that has taken place. "The independence has occasioned lively interest in the techniques of management," Mr. Wynn, who recently returned from a recent trip to India since its establishment, said.

The Indian faculty and research staff have been steadily growing, with new types of educational programs being started. Some of these are geared to the needs of the Indian industry. MIT's activity in management education in India began in 1959 in response to an invitation from the All India Management Association of MIT to conduct seminars in advanced management techniques for senior executives. The seminars, which have been held each summer since 1959, are designed to enroll the participants in a new graduate course to be conducted at MIT. The Indian Institute of Management at Calcutta, which has a new graduate school of management, was established in 1960, is the direct result of the expansion of Indian industry that has taken place. "The independence has occasioned lively interest in the techniques of management," Mr. Wynn, who recently returned from a recent trip to India since its establishment, said.

The Indian faculty and research staff have been steadily growing, with new types of educational programs being started. Some of these are geared to the needs of the Indian industry. MIT's activity in management education in India began in 1959 in response to an invitation from the All India Management Association of MIT to conduct seminars in advanced management techniques for senior executives. The seminars, which have been held each summer since 1959, are designed to enroll the participants in a new graduate course to be conducted at MIT. The Indian Institute of Management at Calcutta, which has a new graduate school of management, was established in 1960, is the direct result of the expansion of Indian industry that has taken place. "The independence has occasioned lively interest in the techniques of management," Mr. Wynn, who recently returned from a recent trip to India since its establishment, said.

The Indian faculty and research staff have been steadily growing, with new types of educational programs being started. Some of these are geared to the needs of the Indian industry. MIT's activity in management education in India began in 1959 in response to an invitation from the All India Management Association of MIT to conduct seminars in advanced management techniques for senior executives. The seminars, which have been held each summer since 1959, are designed to enroll the participants in a new graduate course to be conducted at MIT. The Indian Institute of Management at Calcutta, which has a new graduate school of management, was established in 1960, is the direct result of the expansion of Indian industry that has taken place. "The independence has occasioned lively interest in the techniques of management," Mr. Wynn, who recently returned from a recent trip to India since its establishment, said.

The Indian faculty and research staff have been steadily growing, with new types of educational programs being started. Some of these are geared to the needs of the Indian industry. MIT's activity in management education in India began in 1959 in response to an invitation from the All India Management Association of MIT to conduct seminars in advanced management techniques for senior executives. The seminars, which have been held each summer since 1959, are designed to enroll the participants in a new graduate course to be conducted at MIT. The Indian Institute of Management at Calcutta, which has a new graduate school of management, was established in 1960, is the direct result of the expansion of Indian industry that has taken place. "The independence has occasioned lively interest in the techniques of management," Mr. Wynn, who recently returned from a recent trip to India since its establishment, said.