Letters to The Tech

Euphoria?
To the Editor:

We should like to register our strong disagreement with the article on the "dependency of overwork" which seems to be the central theme in the ambivalent and enervating word of editorial of your October 26 issue. We are appalled by the reading of Mr. Nygren's article (no. 1 of your own paper, and hardly need remind us of the distinction of those who have practiced civil disobedience). We do not believe in Romain Rolland to Gandhi. We would also suggest that "learning" and "the fun" be kept separate, to the extent of knowledge, to the extent of knowledge, to the extent of knowledge, to the extent of knowledge, to the extent of knowledge.

To the Editor:

We do not understand what you meant when you said that universities can fulfill their responsibilities to society. You mentioned a "general concert-going public." If you mean that a university orchestra can enrich this city's artistic climate substantially. To the Editor:

The MIT Orchestra is indeed considered with some accomplished musicians, but let us be wary of calling them "top professionals." Professionals perform music for money; this is not at all the case here. What have impressed and pleased too are the fine backgrounds of so many of our players, that include a particular performance experience of a high musical order.

If you're looking for a nice comfy place to work after graduation, forget about General Electric.

We don't have any place where you can curl up and snooze away the next forty years of your career. If you work for General Electric, you can't call a place your own. You don't get to choose who you work with. You don't get to choose what you work on. You don't get to choose where you work. You don't get to choose when you work. You don't get to choose how much you work.

One thing is certain: You'll be working. You'll have plenty of responsibility. What you won't have is the freedom to do things your way. You won't have the opportunity to make decisions about your work. You won't have the chance to grow as a professional. You won't have the chance to make a difference.

If you're looking for a nice comfy place to work after graduation, forget about General Electric. Forget about the long hours, the cramped spaces, and the lack of creativity. Go somewhere else where you can be yourself, where you can make a difference, where you can grow as a professional.

Sincerely,
