Glove Fight Decides Result; Sophs Collect More Gloves

During the process, the group had to reconvene. The race was run with only two nurses and the class president from each class. Five points were given to the sophomores for winning the race and five points were given to the freshmen for the best looking nurses.

Class Nurses

Both classes had成本ed their names in essence of the class color, blue for the class of '69 and green for the class of '70. Alphabetizing the whole class in a line was the second major event. Only the class president was allowed to speak during it. The sophomores were principal, however, with better plans, having made a "ucky guess" at the event from the rule that no contestant in Field Day has his name on the back of his shirt. They won this event, too, for five points.

The class of '70 won both the unlimited tag of war (for his points) and the co-ed limited (for five points). Both tags of war were held out as a pile of mud especially prepared for the event, but were dropped before the losers were dragged much past their calves.

Glove Fight

The glove fight, worth 25 points, ended the morning and decided the winner of the competition. Originally it was thought that if the class of '70 won and the trophy was given to class president John Diller. At this point a group of sophomores dumped George Jones, Beaver Key president, into the pile of mud prepared by the tags of war. The decision was reversed later, and the mud was separated from the gloves, and the gloves were weighed, so that if the sophomores had collected also two pounds of "gloves more than the freshmen. Beaver Key Field Day Club man Dick Ochst said, "The responsibility of Beaver Key is to officiate fairly Field Day. It means the winning class shall be declared the winner, no matter how it looks."

A group of sophomores paraded around campus with the Field Day Trophy to announce the result.
