Moynihan asks discipline in solving race problems

(Continued from Page 1) preliminary things. They did some extraordinary things, but nothing close to altering the condition of Negro families and of the Negro family structure.

Proposes two solutions
Moynihan suggests two methods of attacking the problem: a full redistribution of income and a family allowance.

• Are the only industrial boasted in the world, does not have a family allowance, and are the only industrial domestic and in the streets.

Discipline needed
Moynihan urged that we must have "the discipline to do some extraordinary things, but nothing close to altering the condition of Negro families and of the Negro family structure."

One of the most troubling problems, he noted, is that the female-based family is not only the result of disadvantage, but helps perpetuate the same situation. In societies of female-headed houses, there is always a high rate of violence caused by the males protecting their masculinity.

"This violent tendency is so strong in Harlem that it is beginning to be common to prescribe tranquilizers for third grade children."

Moynihan urges that we must have "the discipline to do some extraordinary things, but nothing close to altering the condition of Negro families and of the Negro family structure."