Cambridge hires planner

By a 7 to 2 vote, the Cambridge City Council Monday night created the position of Community Planning Coordinator and City Manager Joseph A. DeGuglielmo immediately named Justin Gray to the $188,000 post.

Presently working for the Institute of Public Administration in New York, Gray has been commissioned to draw up a "master plan" for Cambridge after first surveying the city.

He will consult with MIT.

Gray will consult with both MIT and Harvard officials before drawing up his plan, which will hopefully be ready in about eight months.

His job, as described by DeGuglielmo, is to study the problems of Cambridge, "come up with a workable program, and then go to Washington and secure for our city ... Federal monies to implement the program."

Thus the post will try to develop an integrated solution to Cambridge's problems. For, since Federal programs have become more complex, and begun to interfere with each other, the government has been more and more interested in developing complete solutions to community problems.

The master plan will be completed in eight months. Gray will then spend about one year preparing a "development manual".

The plan will be completed in January 1970.

Professor's study warns of weak federal system

By Carmen Agnew

A report issued by the bipartisan congressional Commission of Intergovernmental Relations and prepared by an MIT faculty member has warned that the Federal system might be severely weakened unless the states are able to increase their role in solving urban problems.

Bernard J. Friedenau, Associate Professor of City Planning, who prepared the report for the commission, showed that the main thrust of state participation in urban affairs is effectively removed from current issues such as transportation, pollution control, and control of the size and number of incorporated suburbs from the jurisdiction of the states.

"Innovations are needed," he said. "Changes in the structure of government within metropolitan areas and innovations in relations between the Federal Government, the states, and local communities will be required to overcome the present conflicts of interest and lack of co-ordination which hamper present efforts, according to the report."

It also pointed out that, since three-quarters of the population of the United States will reside in urban areas by 1980, the government must engage in many new activities to assist these communities. For instance, the Federal government might carry out less efficiently.

One report contained many specific proposals, such as state legislation to limit the renting powers of small subunits and limit the incorporation of separate units within urban areas, pointing out where state authority is needed and can be exercised.
