Where the girls aren’t

Recently, discussion after discussion on how to improve the Institute’s ‘students’ atmosphere and solve the problem of a substantial female population. Many of us are concerned about the possibility of abolishing the women’s dormitories and allowing the students to live in mixed housing. Last year, the institute moved to a co-ed policy, attracting more female students. However, many students are not satisfied with the current policy, and they are concerned about the future of the Institute.

As recent events indicate, we aren’t the only predominately male school to face a significant shortage of female students. In fact, the situation has been exacerbated by recent developments. For instance, the school has decided to cut back on the number of male students, which has caused concern among many parents. Additionally, the school has announced that it will no longer offer certain courses to male students, which has led to protests from some groups.

To the Editor:

I write to you to express my concern about the current state of our school. As you may know, we have a significant shortage of female students, which has caused many problems. I believe that the Institute should take action to address this issue.

First, I would like to recommend that the Institute increase the number of female students. This can be achieved by offering more courses that are specifically designed for female students. Additionally, the Institute should consider offering more scholarships for female students, which would help to attract more qualified students.

Second, I would like to suggest that the Institute reconsider its co-ed policy. While this policy has been in place for many years, I believe that it is time for a change. In my opinion, the Institute should move towards a fully co-ed policy, which would allow for a more diverse student body.

In conclusion, I believe that the Institute should take action to address the current shortage of female students. I urge you to consider my suggestions, and I look forward to hearing your response.

Sincerely,
