The Avant-Garde Scene

The Chambers Brothers and the Halucinations appeared at the Boston Tea Party this Saturday night, February 11, and set every one gasping for air when it was over. During their second set the group really had the audience switched on, dancing, clapping, and shouting in time to a five minute drum solo.

Freestyle dancing

Not to be outdone, the Halucinations, who alternated sets with the Chambers Brothers, roared in with their own brand of rock and roll. Depending heavily on the frantic hand-clapping and screaming vocalizations of their lead singer, the Halucinations blasted out a sound that put everyone within hearing on their feet. The mere volume of the music made the legs of chairs and the stage movement of the beat induced dancing that paralleled the tunes of spring.

Boston Tea Party

The Boston Tea Party, where this took place, is an amazing discotheque of itself. The entrance is up a wide, steep flight of stairs between panels labeled with the names of men who have given lights to the world: Promethus, Urrunaa, Watt, Edgerton, Edison, Loo Tae, and others. The dancing is in a huge cavernous room where one is engulfed by cascades of light and sound surrounded by dancers in all types of clothing, from "mad mod" to "trashy." The walls are covered with designs that glow purple and green under fluorescent lights, kaleidoscopic patterns that change shape and color in apparently endless and mesmerizing ways, Campbell soup cans, pictures of Batman, and flashing lights. "Christmas" movies, blobs of color that dance and pulsate with the music, are projected onto a large movie screen that hangs above the dance floor illuminated by brilliant strobe lights that make the dancers flinch in and out of reality.

Neuro-psycho-ology

Dave Hahn, who runs the discotheque and is an MIT graduate, who to think of the Tea Party as an experiment in neuro-psycho-ology, what happens to the mind when it has received so much stimuli that it reaches the overload point? Some people are so overwhelmed by the noise and lights that they collapse into the nearest chair and don't move for the remainder of the evening, others dance themselves into near exhaustion and then there is the fellow who wore a button that said "Take a trip with Jesus."
