Tutors relate course experiences

...tutors receive free room for 12 months and roommates for the academic year. The school believes that one tutor for 35 students represents the optimum condition, and will try to increase the number of tutors, especially in the humanities, until a comparable ratio is reached.

Academic assistance

The primary purpose of the resident tutor is to offer a personal and informal counseling assistance to undergraduate students. However, with the increase in the number of available majors upon undergraduates, a more formal counseling service is provided by a graduate student who knows the ropes of the Institute, and who can become a trusted friend of the student has become highly valuable.

Unlike house tutors employed by most other schools, MIT tutors have no disciplinary functions. They offer advice and help, mainly in the scholastic fields, but more and more in non-academic related aspects of life. The tutors have been chosen upon a store of houses of advice for personal problems, including drugs, girls, and career choices. The latter has been especially helpful to underclassmen who are often without any definite knowledge about the careers they are planning to enter.

Broadcat outlook

It is now harder to be an effective tutor at MIT. Not only has the curriculum changed, but the type of student coming to the Institute has a broader outlook than his counterpart of twenty or more years ago. The new MIT man sees the Institute as science oriented university, offering excellent teaching liberal arts courses. The effective tutor has to be able to dispense knowledge in a wide variety of fields, from physics to humanities, from solid state mechanics to psychology.

Undergraduates, when questioned, have expressed the academic function of their tutors as the counseling function. Most believed that the tutors had made the greatest impact in helping the freshmen to adjust to the work at MIT. All universally mentioned among fraternity men, were the quiz reviews held by tutors, who are invaluable help rendered before exams. Six of the fraternity men mentioned that the tutors had become integral parts of their houses, contributing more than services in the academic and counseling realms.

As in fraternities, the tutors for the dormitories, are chosen for a general background with the Institute, rather than for particular scholastic talent. The freshmen, however, many upperclass dormitory students have the greatest impact in the counseling realm.
