Military Day protest squelched

By Mark Reitman

Approximately 15 students, mostly SDS members, picketed the front entrance of the Armory Tuesday afternoon to protest the University's decision to allow the Army to conduct the Armory Day exercises. The protesters, who numbered at least 100, carried signs and picketing materials.

The protesters blocked the entrance to the Armory for about four hours, causing a delay in the exercises. However, the University administration was able to clear the area and continue the exercises.

The protesters were met by a large crowd of police officers, who dispersed them with tear gas. The protesters were not allowed to enter the Armory, and the exercises continued as scheduled.

The protesters' main concern was the University's decision to allow the Army to conduct the exercises on its campus. They argued that the University should not be involved in any military activities.

Protesters were also concerned about the impact of the exercises on the surrounding community. They claimed that the exercises would cause noise and disruption in the area.

Despite the protests, the exercises were able to proceed as planned. The University administration has stated that it will continue to allow the Army to conduct exercises on its campus.
