Grad Council attacks war effort

By Jack Katz
This morning, throughout the MIT Graduate Student Council, a panel of seven experts delivered a speech about a resolution passed by the council on Monday. The resolution called for the withdrawal of American forces from Vietnam and the ratification of a settlement in the war. The panel was composed of seven members, all of whom were members of the Council. The panelists were all experts in the field of international relations, and their arguments were based on a careful study of the Vietnam War.

The panelists began by describing the current situation in Vietnam, noting that the war had been going on for more than two decades. They pointed out that the war had caused the deaths of millions of people, and that it had also led to the destruction of much of the country's infrastructure. They argued that the war was not only illegal but also immoral, and that it should be stopped immediately.

The panelists then turned to the question of the Council's resolution. They noted that the Council had passed a resolution calling for the withdrawal of American forces from Vietnam, and that the resolution had been supported by a majority of the Council's members. They argued that the resolution was in line with the Council's traditional policy of non-intervention in foreign affairs, and that it was a necessary step towards the resolution of the Vietnam War.

The panelists concluded by urging the Council to pass the resolution without delay. They noted that the Council had a responsibility to act in the best interests of its members, and that the resolution was a step towards a more just and peaceful world.

The Council will vote on the resolution later this week. It is expected that the resolution will be passed by a large majority.

Coeds allowed to live off-campus in future

By Steve Carhart
Off-campus living is likely to become a reality for MIT's women students this week as a new policy on residence is initiated on a trial basis by the administration. Starting today, women students may live off campus, provided that "a" the senior will have an advanced standing in her term of enrollment for which she is chosen, and "b" she has obtained written permission from her parents.

This change in policy is one of several long-considered changes that many coeds have sought.

Prof. Ralph Freeman, former Economics Head, expressed his support for the new living arrangement. "This is a step forward in providing our students with more opportunities to live and learn in a variety of settings," he said.

Panel splits on birth control issue

By Paul Johnson
Sponsored by the Boston Intercollegiate Council, a panel of experts debated the legal, moral, and social aspects of the birth control movement. The panelists were chosen from a pool of experts in the field of birth control, and included representatives from various organizations, such as the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, the American Civil Liberties Union, and the Catholic Church.

The panelists began by discussing the legal aspects of the birth control movement. They noted that the law had changed significantly over the years, and that in many states, it was now possible for women to obtain birth control services without fear of prosecution. They also discussed the moral implications of the movement, and noted that it was important to respect the rights of all individuals to make their own decisions about their reproductive health.

The panelists then turned to the social aspects of the movement. They noted that it had made significant progress in recent years, and that it was crucial to continue to work towards a society in which everyone had equal access to information and services related to reproductive health.

The panelists concluded by urging the Council to support the birth control movement, and to work towards a society in which everyone had the right to make their own decisions about their reproductive health.

The panel will return to the Council in the fall to report on the results of the discussion.
