Feasibility study planned for Mass. Ave. overpass

by Mike Matha

A survey being handled by the MIT Planning Office is attempting to determine the feasibility of a pedestrian bridge across Massachusetts Avenue. Due to the hazards in crossing Mass. Ave., the idea of a pedestrian passageway to bypass the road has been considered for many years. Last year, a survey reported that the project costs $5 million to $10 million. The bridge would be located in many departments, re- solution in information processing,'" Vol. 87, No. 33 Cambridge, Mass., Tuesday, October 3, 1967 5c

Leaves Project MAC

Richard Mills appointed to new computer post

by John Richardson

Richard G. Mills, '54 presently associate director of MIT's Project MAC, has been appointed to the newly established position of Director of Information Processing services. The position was created to provide coordination of all computer facilities to campus. Announcement of the position and appointment of Mills was made by President Howard Johnson.

"The creation of this new position recognizes the critical importance and institute-wide character of the growing activities of faculty, students and administrators in information processing," said President Johnson.

"In addition to our central computer facility, which has been a part of the process of electronic computing, computers of different sizes and types are used in many departments, research laboratories, and administrative offices. Some of these facilities interact constantly with each other and with the central computer." (Please turn to Page 2)

Encounter opens with Letvin

by Pat Szymanski

The traffic jams have been in evidence for some time near the student center, often at the Student Center last Thursday for a lunchtime discussion Thursday afternoon. Approximately 70 people attended and exchanged ideas with Prof. Letvin, who criticized the whole thing as a "quandary." The traffic jams have been in evidence for some time near the student center, often at the planning stage since early in the summer when the campaigns first started; others had not begun to work until recent weeks after re- turning to school. Nevertheless, all were working election day—mailing telephone calls, transport- ing voters to the polls, and watch- ing the ballots being counted.

Two mayoral candidates at- tended the major efforts of the fraternity men. Kevin White, Secretary of State of Massachusetts, who finished second in the pri- mates, and Stanley Adams, held different talents, said his efforts. John Sosne, Republican State Representative from Boston, and a man who has been concerned with the problems of the Back Bay and has worked with MIT fraternities in their community relations effort, was the major sup- port of the fraternity men. Sears was the first Republican candidate to run for the post of mayor in recent years. Much of his strong showing can be attrib- uted to the support given him by the MIT fraternity men. It has also been reported that Mrs. Louise Day Hicks received some help from fraternity men.

PM Wilson's son wins IRS refund

The 25-year-old son of Britain's Prime Minister, an MIT graduate student, has won a battle with the Internal Revenue Service. Robin Wilson, son of Prime Minister Harold Wilson, was able to get $250, a tax in- come, returned $125, a tax in- come, which he had stubbornly paid and the govern- ment paid.

He then discovered that, since he was a British subject and had held the job for less than two years, he was not required to pay any income tax. He then applied for a refund.

The considerable delay, the IRS returned $125. Wilson then wrote to the IRS, Fox News, a column of the Philadelphia "Bulletin," which specializes in helping citizens re- solve problems with the govern- ments, they have to deal with. The student, who had already had com- plained to the IRS, was told, "You have to go through red tape.

He then discovered that, since he was a British subject and had held the job for less than two years, he was not required to pay any income tax. He then applied for a refund.

The considerable delay, the IRS returned $125. Wilson then wrote to the IRS, Fox News, a column of the Philadelphia "Bulletin," which specializes in helping citizens re- solve problems with the govern- ments, they have to deal with. The student, who had already had com-plained to the IRS, was told, "You have to go through red tape.

Go Cards!

The traffic jams in Kenmore Square continue to worsen until into the evening, as acitlics fans flocked to Fenway Park after the Boston Red Sox's final, pennant clinching victory over the Twins.