Epstein receives ASCAP award

In recognition of the "unique prestige value" of his musical compositions, Professor David Epstein of the Harassmatics Department was recently awarded the recipient of one of the 1967-1968 American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers Awards. Professor Epstein, conductor of the MIT Symphony, was selected for ASCAP along with a number of other award winners by an independent panel of music authorities.

ASCAP awards are given in two categories: classical and popular. The value of all the awards given for 1967-1968 is the highest ever, $300,000. Of this figure, $226,200 will go to writers in the field of popular music, while $129,130 will go to composers in the less lucrative field of classical composition.

Awards in the classical, or standard category, are limited to members of ASCAP receiving less than $20,000 yearly in performance royalties and whose works "have a unique prestige value for which adequate compensation would not otherwise be received.'
