Liberal complacency charged in Goodwin address

Professor Richard N. Goodwin, Visiting Professor of Political Public Affairs, was the keynote speaker at a Liberal Club of Boston meeting last night. The theme of the evening was "The Young Liberal in the Presidential campaign of 1968." Goodwin was instrumental in getting the club to endorse the Presidential campaign of Sen. Eugene McCarth, and has been a leading supporter of the club's current activities.

Goodwin began the presentation by addressing the issue of liberalism and its role in society. He stated that "If not for liberal leadership, we must depend on others to tell us of our responsibilities as well as our rights." He went on to say that the "classical battle of liberalism"

Then Goodwin commented on the future of liberalism. He appealed to liberals to "enrich the quality of American life for every citizen and to do so in a manner which will be holy and make theジュール of individual in himself which is the truht source of national direction and generosity of deed." He called for the acceptance of public responsibility for the quality of society, and said that the Democrats ought to realize that their government is also the best politics.

Goodwin next analyzed the growing resistance and opposition to a "coercive society." Goodwin prescribed "free speech opposition against any who claim the right to tell you where to go or listen to our private conversation, as we now how much our Goodwin then shifted to the arena of foreign policy. He pointed out that the President had been "all the harder" and "all the harder" in the critics of the Civil War. Goodwin quoted Lincoln's words; "I want you to know that I still recognize the Constitution of the United States for the moment, as the President of the United States."

Goodwin succinctly said that Lincoln's attack was too violent for him, but he added that "for anyo-
