The Yellow-Billed Wordpicker.
It helps you remember them.

The Yellow-Billed Wordpicker is a marking pen that pinpoints names, glean words, and highlights them all in bright yellow. You don't use it to write down the words you have to remember. You use it to write over them.

The Yellow-Billed Wordpicker. It reminds you how smart you should be. And for 49c, you shouldn't have to be. So pick up one.

By Robert Fournier

"Although Thomas Middleton was considered by his own age as a natural moralist, to us his moralizing seems to fluctuate between physical disgust and an unwholesome fascination. Observed with the idea of lust as a mortal sin, he makes it the prime mover in his dramas; so, WOMEN BEWARE WOMEN (written about 1614) becomes a kind of psychopathia sexualis, tracing in vivid detail the gradations of passion between Platonic love and bestiality."

This begins the director Lawrence Senelick's note to the current production at the Loeb Drama Center. With such an introduction, it seems strange the play is being done at all. But the program does advance two additional arguments in its favor that it accurately portrays a decadent society, and that it is relevant to similar modern problems. The play does not bear this out, however; and whatever appeal it does have is mostly from other sources. This is true, most simply, because the result is not convincing. While some of the scenes do work individually, the massive logic results leave it unmoved. The play makes up about men's nature that is a world's obvious anyhow, so whatever characters fit modern hypocrisies or little matter. As for the dressing in particular, the use of it to write down the words you have to remember. You use it to write over them. It reminds you how smart you should be. And for 49c, you shouldn't have to be. So pick up one.
