Real estate, city agencies share housing blame

By Robert Donato, Group Leader

The problem of campus housing is a thorny one, and it appears that the city and the university are at odds over the issue. The city has proposed a rent control law, while the university has opposed it. The city council is currently studying the issue, and a discussion group has been formed to examine it.

According to Mayor Sullivan of Cambridge, the lack of housing in the area has been a major problem for years. He noted that the city has been working on a housing crisis for years, but that progress has been slow. He went on to say that the city has a long-term plan to address the issue, but that it will take time to implement.

The mayor also pointed out that the city has a number of programs in place to address the housing crisis. He noted that the city has a program to build new housing, and that it has also increased its funding for affordable housing.

The university has also been active in addressing the housing crisis. It has a number of programs in place to address the issue, and it has also increased its funding for affordable housing.

The mayor and the university are working together to address the issue, and they hope to come to a resolution soon.