Psychologist finds students 'educated in isolation'

"The MIT student is educated in isolation, and perhaps is competitive isolation." This is one of the conclusions drawn by Malcolm Parlett, a research psychologist with the Educational Research Center at Cambridge. He had spent the summer studying students at MIT.

The ERC has released the draft of Parlett's report, a shortened version of which was delivered to the Educational Research Center Colloquium in October. His study was of the effects of a semester studying 6.711.

Parlett's report, a shortened version of his study, was delivered to the Educational Research Center Colloquium in October.

Parlett next discusses the factors detrimental to this feeling of involvement. One, which Parlett considers perhaps most important, is that students always had the project on their minds, to the detriment of their students, perhaps most important, is that students always had the project on their minds, to the detriment of their students. 5) Allow students the time to get involved.
