Albert attacks foreign policy

Convicted atom spy Sobell charged trial was political

By Bill Roberts

"We are thus starting a trial, you can call it a political trial," Thaddeus Sobell, one of the two Sobells to be tried for espionage. Sobell, who is reputed to have been a major contributor to the Manhattan Project, is currently on trial for espionage charges. In his opening statement, Sobell's attorney, Alan Dershowitz, stated that Sobell was a victim of McCarthyism and that the trial was politically motivated.

Dershowitz argued that the government had used Sobell as a scapegoat to divert attention from its own failings. He pointed out that Sobell had been convicted on perjury and espionage charges, and that these convictions were used to justify the government's efforts to suppress dissent.

Dershowitz also argued that the government's actions were motivated by political considerations. He cited the government's efforts to use the trial as a means of deflecting attention from its own failures, and from the fact that it was facing political opposition.

Sobell's attorney argued that the government's actions were motivated by political considerations, and that the trial was a political trial. He cited the government's efforts to use the trial as a means of deflecting attention from its own failures, and from the fact that it was facing political opposition.

Dershowitz also argued that the government's actions were motivated by political considerations, and that the trial was a political trial. He cited the government's efforts to use the trial as a means of deflecting attention from its own failures, and from the fact that it was facing political opposition.

Sobell's attorney argued that the government's actions were motivated by political considerations, and that the trial was a political trial. He cited the government's efforts to use the trial as a means of deflecting attention from its own failures, and from the fact that it was facing political opposition.

Dershowitz also argued that the government's actions were motivated by political considerations, and that the trial was a political trial. He cited the government's efforts to use the trial as a means of deflecting attention from its own failures, and from the fact that it was facing political opposition.

Sobell's attorney argued that the government's actions were motivated by political considerations, and that the trial was a political trial. He cited the government's efforts to use the trial as a means of deflecting attention from its own failures, and from the fact that it was facing political opposition.

Dershowitz also argued that the government's actions were motivated by political considerations, and that the trial was a political trial. He cited the government's efforts to use the trial as a means of deflecting attention from its own failures, and from the fact that it was facing political opposition.

Sobell's attorney argued that the government's actions were motivated by political considerations, and that the trial was a political trial. He cited the government's efforts to use the trial as a means of deflecting attention from its own failures, and from the fact that it was facing political opposition.

Dershowitz also argued that the government's actions were motivated by political considerations, and that the trial was a political trial. He cited the government's efforts to use the trial as a means of deflecting attention from its own failures, and from the fact that it was facing political opposition.