Notes on conversion

By Carson Agnew

The Institute's recent move to begin the process of including all students in the Vietnam policy decision-making process may be interpreted as a step towards the realization of the Cambridge Moratorium. As President Johnson has suggested, the movement's goal is to mobilize public opinion against the war. If it is to be effective, we must have the maximum opportunity for students to discuss the war and to engage in active resistance. The university has an important role to play in this process. It is crucial that the university provide a forum for open and honest discussion of the war. This includes providing opportunities for students to express their views and to participate in the decision-making process. It is also important that the university take steps to ensure that the war is not being used to suppress dissent. The university should be a place where students can express their views without fear of retribution. It is a time of great uncertainty, and the university must be a place of stability.

The text of this note has been abridged for the sake of brevity. The full text can be found in the original source.