Troop withdrawal

(Continued from page 1) "I think it is time that we found out what it is that we are running so smoothly. It's time we stop letting decisions be made for us and decide for ourselves what we support."

Step by Nixon.

Wiesner, speaking about the Moratorium, said that it was planned to help bring about an early end to the war. When the President and those who back his view, he continued "say that October 15 will not help the view," he continued "say President and those who back early end to the war. "When the planned to help bring about an Moratorium, said that it was itself and became an obsession. Their love grew, paused, renewed and communication,. It's time we

Our protest stems from the recent disclosure that the United States involved itself without any request from that country's government, and the widely held suspicion that the justification for our vast escalation of that war, the Gulf of Tonkin incident, was at best an incredible intelligence and communications blunder and possibly even a deliberate deception. The voices of humanity," he continued, "say that it is hard to be proud of our vast power punishing a tiny country that doesn't know how to quit. They say that pride should not compel us to contine the suffering and destruction of the past five years. And al

Their love grew, paused, renewed itself and became an obsession.

about possible courses of action, Wiesner said that the only one suitable to him is to "stop on a very urgent timetable. All other courses have grave uncertainties. Nixon's course," he explicated, "is to build up the South Vietnamese army until it can stand by itself, meanwhile slowly or swiftly withdrawing our forces. Past experience should not make us optimistic about this route. Because in any event we would end up with an endless commitment to support a military government of low attractiveness."

The major point against a quick withdrawal, according to Wiesner, is the fate of the people who allied themselves with the United States. He suggested relocation to the US or another friendly Asian country as a possible solution.

About possible courses of action, Wiesner said that the only one suitable to him is to "stop on a very urgent timetable. All other courses have grave uncertainties. Nixon's course," he explicated, "is to build up the South Vietnamese army until it can stand by itself, meanwhile slowly or swiftly withdrawing our forces. Past experience should not make us optimistic about this route. Because in any event we would end up with an endless commitment to support a military government of low attractiveness."

We get carried away when you come around... and we love it!

Budweiser:
is the only beer in America that's Beechwood Aged (But you know that.)

(c) 1969 THE TECH, BOSTON UNIVERSITY, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1969 PAGE 7