Panthers call police killers

A day-long seminar intended to involve college students in the problem of water pollution will be held in Kresge Auditorium beginning at 9:30 am Monday, December 29.

This seminar, one of nine to be held during the Christmas holidays, it be conducted by the North East Regional Office of the National Society of Science. Each of these seminars will be held in a regional SCOPE office and will involve college students in the problem of water pollution.

In announcing the seminars, Hickel stated that college students could become involved in the problem by making suggestions for protection and pollution control of the nation's waterways.

"The seminar, which will be an opportunity for college students to become involved in solving the water pollution problem, will be conducted by seminar leaders, who will be the National SCOPE, a national organization of the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals." Hickel said.

Building of a more comprehensive clean-up program, Hickel said, is part of the National SCOPE's program. Each of the seminars will be conducted by a regional SCOPE.
